Keynote speakers

Sabelo Ndlovu-Gatsheni / Linda Tuhiwai Smith/ João Paraskeva

Our collective pulse quickens as demands for transformation and decolonization become more urgent! What do these words mean and what do these calls amount to? Did the transformation agenda not bring about the required changes? Is decolonization replacing transformation? Can we transform and decolonize at the same time? Why do we have to decolonize if we have been transforming? These are the questions that currently plague our minds and motivate us to engage in serious action as educators and students.

Neither transformation nor decolonization are new terms, yet they remain shrouded by uncertainty.

Despite the uncertainty, joys and complexity that constitutes our current education contexts - we are teaching, doing research and community engagement within an era of decolonization and transformation! The fees must fall protests and struggles was and remain a significant wake-up call to this realization! We are right in the middle of this time and space! We have many experiences, stories, contributions, progress and challenges that we have to share, whether or not we call it decolonization or transformation or even understand the full complexity of these concepts/experiences/struggles.

It is from this vantage point that this conference aims to create a space for collective dialogue/s about our experiences and how we can work towards bringing theory and practice together in courageous and imaginative ways - that make the unknown a little bit more knowable and doable. Although the conference themes speak to particular ideas within decolonizing and transformation debates, they are also broad enough to encapsulate all areas of education theorizing, engagement, research and teaching within contemporary education contexts. You are thus invited to submit your abstract(s) focusing on what you are currently teaching/researching/engaging in/ experiencing/struggling with/questioning in your own/broader educational context(s). You are encouraged to be motivated by the following subthemes BUT you should not be limited by them.
